

ReGen Civics Quest Field Guide

How We Organize

regencivics.earth

What This Quest Is

Learn the tools of non-hierarchical group coordination and apply at least one in a real group. Holacracy, Sociocracy, consent-based governance, circle practice, commons governance. These patterns have names. They can be learned and applied.

Story Card

Every group that tries to work together without a boss eventually hits the same wall. Who makes the final call? How do you handle disagreement? These are not unsolvable problems. They are solved, repeatedly, by groups around the world who have developed specific coordination patterns. The patterns have names. Some groups burn through them in a year through conflict and collapse, while others spend generations using them well. The difference is usually whether the patterns were made explicit before the crisis hit. This quest is about learning those tools and actually using them in a real group.

How To Do This Quest

Step 1: Learn the landscape of coordination patterns.

Study at least two different approaches to non-hierarchical group coordination: Holacracy/Sociocracy, Circle Practice, or Elinor Ostrom's Commons Governance Principles.

Step 2: Identify a real group to practice with.

A project team, household, community organization, or ReGen Civics group. The practice needs real stakes and real people to be useful.

Step 3: Introduce at least one coordination pattern.

Choose something appropriate to the group's size and maturity: a check-in round, a consent decision process, a role-clarity exercise, a retrospective.

Step 4: Notice what the pattern does and does not do.

Run at least three sessions using the same pattern before evaluating it. Ask the group: what worked, what did not, what would we change?

Step 5: Document the pattern and your findings.

Write up what you did, how the group responded, what the pattern helped with, and what it did not address.

Step 6: Share your experience.

Post your write-up in the forum. Your documented experience is useful to others in the game working on the same problems.

Deliverable

A documented account of a coordination pattern you introduced and practiced in a real group, including reflection on what worked and what you would do differently.

Tips

- The check-in round is the single most universally useful coordination pattern.
- Consent is different from consensus. Consent requires no fundamental objection. It is much faster and usually better.
- The most important governance question: how do we make and revisit agreements?

Resources

- Reinventing Organizations by Frederic Laloux
- The Sociocracy 3.0 Practical Guide: sociocracy30.org (free online)
- Governing the Commons by Elinor Ostrom
- NVC by Marshall Rosenberg (communication is the foundation of coordination)

A Place to Write

The pattern you introduced, how it went, what you learned:
